BACKGROUND

The Western Balkans (WB) continued to be a transit route for irregular migrants trying to reach Western Europe from Turkey. Despite a significant decrease in the number of irregular migrants arriving at the EU's external borders since the migration crisis in 2015, the migration pressure in the Western Balkans remains high, as does smuggling and the demand for facilitation services.¹ For example, during the first ten months of 2020, detections on the Western Balkan routes were 122% higher compared to the same period in 2019 indicating continued significant movements in the region and beyond.² The authorities of some of the countries in the region have implemented measures such as strengthening border controls, which have had an effect on the migratory routes, hindering movements throughout the region. At the same time, these measures primarily appear to slow down or divert migratory movements, instead of preventing or deterring them altogether. Irregular migrants usually try to cross borders multiple times and many eventually succeed. Another side-effect of these measures is that they increase the demand for facilitation services.³ In the Western Balkans as an active transit area, migrants staying for a longer period of time (particularly those with an unregulated status), difficulties crossing state borders, and an increase in the price of smuggling certainly represent circumstances that increase migrants' risk factors and expose them to various forms of abuse, violence or exploitation, especially the most vulnerable among them (women, children, unaccompanied minors). Although deaths along the WB route are relatively rare, they do occur. Smuggling of migrants is continuously among the main topics in EU Progress Reports for WB countries.

The number of migrants who entered Serbia in 2020 was 25.093,⁴ but only 2,830 registered their intention to seek asylum and a total of 144 people applied for asylum.⁵ Subsidiary protection was granted to 12 persons and refugee status has got 17 persons.⁶ In the previous year Serbian police filed 134 criminal charges against 179 persons suspected of smuggling, out of which 164 persons were convicted.⁷
